Studies

have found that caregiver distress is a predictor of medical complications in nursing home and hospital patient populations. The purpose of this study was to determine whether caregiver distress was correlated with adverse medical events in home health care patients. A convenience sample of 196 caregivers was assessed using the profile of mood states-revised (POMS-R) and Maslach Burnout Inventory scales. In addition, medical complications experienced by home health care patients and their caregivers were tracked. Correlational analysis revealed a significant relationship between caregivers' perceptions of increased caregiver stress and serious medical
