System.out.println("Static block started"); x = 5; System.out.println("Static block completed"); } public static void main(String args[]) { System.out.println(x); } } Since x is static, it will be initialised at the time of class loading, but is it guaranteed that static block will be executed before any method in the class will be called? For eg: In the case of the above code, can we assume that System.out.println(x); will print 5 as x will have already been initialised by the time it is executed? A: since x is static, it will be initialised at the time of class loading Incorrect. x has not been initialized until the first time that the static initializer is executed, when it will be initializing the variable. but is it guaranteed that static block will be executed before any method in the class will be called Yes, any instances of this class will be initialized before any 3e33713323
