November 12, Venezuelan Attorney General Luisa Ortega announced that her office had found what it described as “obvious violations of electoral laws” during the country’s legislative elections, which took place on May 20. The allegations centered on the failure by some media outlets to follow the law regarding their financing, as well as alleged use of social networks to manipulate public opinion. Attorney General Ortega made the announcement after international and national media had examined numerous documents related to the May 20 elections. Ortega’s announcement did not specify which laws had been violated. This decision was, according to the attorney general, a “second step” necessary to implement “the pending litigation” filed against the government of Nicolás Maduro. This step follows the Venezuelan Inter-American Commission on Human Rights’ (CIDH) decision to place two articles on the Venezuelan Constitution on hold after the May 20 elections. These articles concern the presidential elections of 2018. “The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights will continue to monitor the situation in Venezuela,” the CIDH declared at the end of August. The first article requested that the Venezuelan State ensure to the population “free and general access to adequate information concerning the process of elections” and the second “effective protection of the integrity of the voting and electoral process.” The CIDH also submitted other requests to the Venezuelan state, as well as other international organizations, including a new information request with the United Nations on the events of the elections. On November 12, it became known that the CIDH had ordered Venezuela’s police and armed forces to stop detaining members of the Venezuelan National Guard who allegedly took part in the electoral violence against the opposition. The CIDH had sent a team to the Venezuelan capital to investigate the post-electoral violence and the conduct of the National Guard. Ortega noted that she received 14 letters sent by various human rights organizations criticizing irregularities in the elections. In her announcement, the attorney general referred to the allegations made in the letters, saying that they “contain misinformative bff6bb2d33

The Elden game is a fantasy RPG where you develop a character to strengthen your skills and fight together with your friends. When you get hit by critical attacks, your character will be sent to a "Retry" screen. There, you can choose to keep retrying or attempt to save up your "Credits" to go back to your "Action Points" and go on. If you restore your Action Points by spinning a special part of your body, you can activate an Aura. What are Auras? Auras are magical powers that you can call upon to help you during battle. You can activate them by spinning a special part of your body. The number of "Credits" you have saved up determines the power of the Aura and how much damage it will deal.

Battle Scene The battle scene is divided into three stages: the first is the movement stage, the second is the action stage, and the third is the final stage. During the movement stage, you can freely move, fight, and move to another spot. During the action stage, the battle is played out, and in the final stage, you can use the outcome of your battle to improve your character or activate an Aura.

Combination Attacks In addition to "regular attacks" (normal attacks), your character can activate an aura to deal special damage. A combination attack lets you deal even higher damage and increase your combo multiplier. You can continuously activate this feature by selecting "Spin" and "Spin (Every)" from the movement screen.

- A Normal Attack It is a regular attack. It does not deal any damage.
- An Aura Attack It is done by spinning a special part of your body, and a special effect is triggered. Depending on the setting, the aura can deal damage or buff your character. For example, spinning your head to activate the head aura can deal damage. When you spin the body, you activate the body aura. The body aura buffs your attacks.

Attacking after Your Aura Attacks In addition to Aura attacks, you can activate your Aura during the action stage of the game. The more "Creds" you save, the more damage your Aura does and the faster your aura effect starts. The number of "Creds" you can save up is determined by the number of action points you have.
