Key technical advancements enabled by HyperMotion Technology include: All-new procedural animations All-new flexible physics Realistic deformation Integrated ball physics Detailed Player Movement Our goal in creating realistic player movements was to make players more responsive and intuitive to control during gameplay. We made several technological advancements to help players move more naturally. In our gameplay engine, we introduced a new, improved animation system with reduced processing requirements. This animation system retains “updates” from the previous games, but with new animation systems that are optimized for our new gameplay engine. To update and improve responsiveness, we use a new method of updating animations between actions, cutting down processing and allowing the game to act faster and make more responsive decisions about when to initiate animations. To improve fluidity, player animations were made so that all actions triggered by the player are done in less than a second. This enables more fluid and natural looking animations for player while capturing gameplay speed. Improved Simulation Whether it’s defending, boosting, transitioning from high to low intensity, or making runs up the pitch, our goal is to give players the feeling that they are actually on the pitch playing the game at the highest intensity. With our new physics engine, the feeling of a player transferring energy in an effortless manner from one player to another is now closer to reality. Just like in real-life, players will transfer energy to the ball and to each other on impact, recovering the energy they spent to turn defense into attack. Touching the ball with the hands and feet is only a small part of our mechanics. We created a detailed physics engine that makes realistic contact between players and the ball. When players make contact with each other, or the ball, during a tackle, they’ll feel as though they can perform any move. Realistic Body Deformation Our goal with the new deformation technology was to enable players to make plays that feel as realistic as possible. The physics engine in this game allows players to make unlimited contact with the ball. With our body deformation technology, players can make changes to the curvature of their bodies with the ball, truly feeling the physical contact they make. This adds more realism to the way they make plays that wouldn’t be possible if the player was only able to make contact with the ball with his/her hands and feet.
