We have developed technology for the expression of minibodies as secreted fusion proteins in E. coli. The resulting fusion proteins are functional and retain the ability of the minibody to bind specifically to antigens while retaining the native conformation of the parent antibody. This technology makes possible the isolation of any immunoglobulin subclass that can be produced in large quantities in prokaryotic host cells. It is an object of the present invention to provide a transgenic non-human animal with a nucleic acid sequence corresponding to a nucleotide sequence encoding a heavy chain or a light chain of an immunoglobulin molecule.Media support, preoperative evaluation, and surgery for Parkinson's disease tremor by use of stereotactic radiation.
