Make sure you Download Highly Compressed version (100 mb) of.Q: what is the difference between the preceeding and the proceeding statement What is the difference between the following statements: Statement 1: { if(i_callback) i_callback(); } Statement 2: i_callback(); Can anyone explain please? A: The first one calls the callback function if it is defined, if it is not defined and you don't use it, the second one will just call the function by itself. { if (i_callback) i_callback(); } This will make your callback function better abstracted, and you don't have to worry about creating it if it is not defined. Since you have the possibility to add more complex code to your if statement (ie: another condition), you can easily add more, and this way, you will avoid calling functions that should not be called. A: The first line just calls the callback function if it's defined. If the callback function doesn't exist (or you just forgot to define it), the second one will call it. On a slightly related note, your question makes me think that maybe you have a background in some other language where conditions are more than one statement long. In C++/C#/Java/C# etc. you can combine conditions without any code duplication, e.g. like this: if (condition1) condition2 = true; if (condition3) condition2 = false; If the conditions aren't guaranteed to be sequential (due to the example above), you usually have to duplicate code: if (condition1) { if (condition2) { condition2 = true; } } if (condition3) { if (condition2) { condition2 = false; } } Or you can do this which looks more like your example: if (condition1) { if (condition2) {
