This study investigated the effectiveness of a combined approach consisting of modular and individual training to enhance detection of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) during the early stages of recovery. Participants (n = 19) with PTSD diagnosis and at least one close family member or friend participated in 4 sessions over a period of 12 weeks. The training included enhanced computer-based screening and clinical interview (SCID-5) training (Module 1), group cognitive behavioural therapy (CBT) (Module 2), and individual CBT (Module 3). Participants in each module were allocated to either the control or experimental conditions. Participants in the experimental group showed significantly greater improvement in PTSD symptoms and symptom clusters, and in psychosocial functioning, compared to the control group. Moderately sized effects sizes were detected for PTSD severity (d = 0.45) and social functioning (d = 0.40). This study indicated that a combined approach consisting of modular and individual training can be an effective tool to enhance early identification of PTSD in primary care.
