He states simply that its better to have things you dont control than to have what you do control being used for undesirable purposes. Its a nice catch phrase. Its just a bit shortsighted because the word control is not even in his statement. One might ask if Joshua is better off with HIS control being used rather than the global warming skeptics having theirs. Sure, but that aint the question. CRACK DEEPFREEZE STANDARD 7.22.060.3453 SERIAL LATEST We are now back to Joshuas double standard. His whole argument is based on the idea of control, and it appears not that he understands that he does not have that control. At least thats what some of his arguments imply. Furthermore, the idea that control means him should have control is silly, at least from a scientific point of view. The argument should center on the question of what we should control and why. Thats also a major problem with Joshuas argument. He doesnt even bother to do this. I can see him attacking those who are not in sympathy with him and his world view, but no one believes that our position on man-made global warming is unscientific, and certainly no one believes that we hold this position for the wrong reasons. He has no authority to tell us we are wrong because he is the last person who should be doing that. An academic or other scientist has that authority. And, of course, as already pointed out, the IPCCs global average temperature change has never been raised to the 30-year standard. Its ALWAYS been to the 20-year standard. So, whenever they quote the global mean temperature change, they are blatantly misrepresenting their own work. Which, of course, means that their opinion carries no weight at all. Its all a bunch of extra noise.
