Each civilization has its own unique advantages and disadvantages, and will challenge players with different tactics. The player will need to research, create, fund and trade to better equip his empire. The player can level up their technologies one, two or three times. Each of the 12 civilizations have different specializations: Russian, Chinese, Egyptian, Greek, etc. to keep things interesting. Each civilization has four primary nations and each nation has further sub-national units to choose from. Each nation has one special ability, which means the nation will have one bonus effect on their turn. This includes cities that the players build to increase their land borders. Also each nation can build a variety of structures. Conflicts exist between each civilization. The player will need to find ways to gain the upper hand as well as negotiate agreements. Diplomacy is, at first, non-aggressive with neighbors, using trade, science, or culture to find common ground. Each civilization can build wonder buildings to grant bonuses. Wonders provide unique benefits to the player, which can boost their standing in the game. Wonders are usually built at exotic locations. Games can be downloaded via forums, but the best place for full games is the Civilization III official forums at <http://forums.civfanatics.com/>. Download times range from hours to days, depending on the location of the server. The game began in the year 4000 BC with around 250 cities on the map and was ended at the year 1000 AD, if the game was saved. As the game progressed up to the year 1000, the player starts the game on the verge of technology 9 and must build up from there. The player must build a civilization with global domination in mind. While the game is quite addictive, many reviewers noted that it is no longer as intuitive as the previous two titles, due to the more in-depth features and graphics.

If you have been playing the Civilization games before, this version will be like a breath of fresh air. This Civilization game will help you conquer the lands, which may come as a surprise to veterans of the previous two games. One of the nice things about the Civilization games is that there is a good deal of variety when it comes to how the games are played out. Games in the series have been about conquering the world, and the most time consuming and expensive decisions when it comes to winning the game are resource gathering (food) and building units. These decisions are made fairly early on, but only early. The early game is very important and yet is often overlooked. This is a very nice feature of the Civilization series. You can now start in the Stone Age and play for 300 years to the brink of the present day in an easily digestible form of the series. You can either pick your human civilization, or you can play as one of the other civilizations from the series - Goths, Egyptians, Persians, et cetera, each of which has a unique skill tree and gameplay options. The main difference from the other two iterations of the game is the change in conflict system. Instead of forcing you to wait until the AI declares war, you can just click on any enemy city on the map and press 'attack'. The AI will immediately declare war if it is nearby. It will offer to leave peacefully if it's in a safe place, or if it runs out of food, but will invade if you don't respond promptly enough. Similarly, if you're in a nearby city and the AI declares war, you will be prompted to become a defendant and fight back. 5ec8ef588b
