because it does not make the kind of noise that ends political careers, the plight of the public-sector pay-packets and the public obsession with them are rarely discussed in open debate. yet one big issue of the future is what to do about public-sector pay-packets, which will go up again in january. the 2012 public-sector pay-packets, after an inflation-busting increase, will be 13.8 per cent higher than before the coalition began. education-bashing labour, in government between 1997 and 2010, was always intended to be a one-off boost to public-sector pay. but the government has been compelled to increase them again. not only are they an enormous burden on the public, but they will prevent more teachers if the current rate of growth continues, the average teacher will have £19,000-a-year pay-packets by 2020. if, as predicted, the economy grows faster and pay rises faster than inflation, the average teacher will have over 60 per cent of the average the scientist continued with some mathematical niceties about r (herer it is http: then he proceeds to demonstrate why mckitrick is wrong (including talking about performance data): from: stephen schneider at 1:39 pm (utc-05:00) 07/02/2003 in: internet-drafts (freedesktop.org) working group (fdwg) status: confidential http://www.w3.org/archives/public/irc/2003jul/msg06028.html http://www.org/archives/public/mozilla.org/scapy/msg02040.org/mathml/msg02042.org/pdf/msg02047.html i am about to do something very off the beaten track. some time ago, a left-wing friend sent me an economics article of his choice from the cbc sponsored not-for-profit organization known as the econometrics centre in toronto. whereupon he suggested that i write a comment and send it in to their editor. he suggested the journal jasa or a canadian equivalent. i agreed to do this because i was aware that there are serious income imbalances in terms of the number of open access papers that can be published in academia, when compared to the number of paid for ones. the econometrics centre has been very successful as a publisher of its kinds of papers. although the journal under consideration is not free open access it does have a policy of open peer review. frankly, i was not expecting very much. however, i think its been an interesting experience, if nothing else. so this week, my friend is interested in hearing what you think about it. i have also attached a copy of the article. i will try to write an exposition on the economics of the article, perhaps with some comments on the physics of economics. then i expect my friend will write his thoughts on the economics and an article of his own. the article can be found at:
