moreover, reloaderactivator reduces the size of the file by further analyzing the actual application and taking advantage of the baking process during the installation. so in my case, the size went from 9.2 mib (the unzipped version) to 1.2 mib (the unzipped version), for the same executable. you can see the difference in the example below. the image shows the size of the executable compressed with 7-zip (used for my tests). you can see that the application is quite a bit smaller than the compressed version. but if you look closely at the percentage, it's pretty much the same size. so, that's the strange thing about the files. the number of bytes goes down, but the percentage the total size of the application remains the same. so what this leads to is that the application becomes much lighter (there is less data to decompress and therefore it takes less time to decompress) but at the same time, it also becomes smaller. as you can see in the second image, compressed with 7-zip, the size is indeed smaller, but the
