darwin's theory of natural selection arose from his observation of the evolution of domestic animals and plants. he demonstrated that living organisms can change over time through mutations and reproduction, and that the best adapted organisms survive and reproduce. darwin rejected the existence of supernatural forces in the universe, and replaced them with an adaptationist theory that explained life through the struggle for existence. darwin was influenced by the work of thomas malthus (1766-1834), who argued that human beings competed with one another for resources, and by richard whately (1787-1863), who argued that a universal law of nature governed the evolution of societies. darwin also accepted the theory of evolution set forth by lamarck (1744-1829), who argued that the physical characteristics acquired during the lifetime of an organism would be passed on to offspring. lamarckism had been rejected by the majority of europeans at the time darwin was writing, although it continued to influence the work of such nineteenth-century naturalists as john lubbock (1833-1913). in the late nineteenth century, naturalists returned to a lamarckian conception of evolution, and at least some scientists continue to accept this. darwin published his theory of natural selection in 1859. but he did not publish his theory of sexual selection until 1871, and the evidence for this theory had been accumulating since the 1820s. darwin's theory was an important early step in the development of evolutionary theory, and is often credited with being one of the first to recognize the evolutionary significance of sexual selection. darwin argued that the struggle for existence is manifested in the struggle between individuals, and that individuals with a particular character are more likely to survive and reproduce. darwin's theory of natural selection became a key element of modern biology and science in general, and has influenced the way in which humans and other species have been viewed in modern western culture.

Contemporary Postcolonial Theory A Reader Pdf

post-colonial and feminist theories have been particularly affected by marxist theory. and marxist theory has had a lasting influence on these disciplines. for example, postcolonial theory is a branch of literary theory, specifically feminist theory. while the literature of the colonial era has been of interest to postcolonial theorists, the literature of the marxist era has been the most influential of the three eras of literary history. post-colonial theorists and feminist theorists are not interested in the political and economic causes of colonialism, but in the way that literature constructs ideas about the nature of the nation and the place of women in it. marxist theories are thought to be too reductionist in the way they reduce all culture to economic structure. post-colonial theory is founded on the idea that colonialism has a continuing influence on culture. feminist theory, on the other hand, is defined by the political participation of women. both marxist and post-colonial theories give weight to the power of certain groups of people and the repression of others. but marxist theory tends to see power as a material force, not a human one. critical theory is particularly interested in discourses of power, such as race, gender, and sexuality. critical theory is influenced by marxism, since marxism as a system of thought is concerned with social inequalities and the way that power is exercised. however, critical theory is more concerned with the construction of those inequalities.

critical theory uses radical tactics, such as deconstruction and the construction of alternative systems of thought. critical theory's methods often include bringing forward the contingency of language. critical theory encourages its adherents to understand themselves as members of the oppressed groups that critical theory seeks to help. critical theory is interested in the social construction of knowledge; it is concerned with how knowledge is disseminated in society. in a critical theory perspective, knowledge is important not in the way that it is reproduced, but in the way that it functions to reproduce inequality and domination. in fact, critical theory is interested in how knowledge is used, not just the content of knowledge.
