Some of the people who got the opportunity to use the iPad Pro's and Apple Pencil's editing 'on the go' were really impressed—and excited. Will we see this sort of enthusiasm for new technology on the desktop in the future? The nine-person Adobe Stock editorial team reviewed over 12,000 images for this project. To do this, they used Lightroom CC and the Creative Cloud Libraries (CCL) to batch upload almost 12,000 images to Adobe Stock; that allowed them to quickly review collections and tags as the project progressed. This reduced the need to log back into Lightroom, and also help identify low-quality images that can be removed more quickly by Adobe Stock, saving authors time and money. In the project, they also tested programmatic automated workflows that quickly and reliably created ever-more-detailed metadata automatically—without requiring authors to log in to Adobe Stock. Quickly removing low-quality images from a project after it is complete can improve its performance and save authors both time and money. Mark Farrow, head of Adobe Stock and general manager at

Adobe Stock Digital Publishing, says, “We’ve made a lot of changes to our beta testing process, including the high volume of photos we have been including. But we have also listened to the community’s thoughts regarding the use of CC Libraries, and we are very pleased with the feedback that we have received. CC Libraries are an important new feature of Lightroom CC, so we’re really grateful to see their use in this project to help improve lightroom and its usage.”
