The Painterly Effect in Photoshop Labs is very interesting. The ability to define shapes and apply them to a layer within a Photoshop document, which you can control via the brush tool, is a very useful feature (though I continue to prefer my Brush's "complexity" setting to not only exactly count each brush shape but also to "smartly" mask out unwanted areas). You can embed all of the layers of a PSD into layered Photoshop files. Include anything you want, even document type definitions, tables or charts. Everything is documented and is used by AI to optimize your PSD and keep it organized and compressed. It seems like the next Photoshop will be faster and easier than the previous one, and Adobe says it will release an update for Lightroom in May. Here's hoping the PSD and AI improvements make it to Lightroom. I use this all the time while in Client mode. Now a new version of Lightroom has been released. You can now reopen a previous Lightroom LR xxx version from within the new version and see the changes applied. This really speeds up client review. In conclusion, the latest Lightroom update is 2GB, enough to save two times more photos than before. The new updates bring a number of new features, improved organization, as well as a few other changes, like adding Spot Healing Brush and spot Removal, and not to mention that the Apple Camera Connection Kit is now officially supported via a plug-in. The Packshot feature is still there, which makes you share your most recent photos instantly via email or USB. The new support for cropped RAW files on Fujifilm X-T1 is good news indeed, although I had assumed that the application would be a lot more stable than it is. Actually, a stable application is one that is as simple as possible while still supporting its core functionality.

It's not "paint bucket", it's "paint bucket with a gradient" - this tool fills your image with gradient from your selected color. The Gradient tool lets you lower and raise gradually any color in your image. You can change colors of any object by simply adjusting the Amount and/or the Lightness of the color. With the Gradient tool you can create a soft graduated edge to your image. e3d0a04c9c
