Research In Motion today confirmed the company would be releasing a new all-touchscreen device in December of this year. It will also mark the debut of a new operating system designed for touchscreens. Those reasons are probably enough to get RIM watchers excited. The new operating system may prove to be one of RIM's biggest pushes since the launch of the Z10, which was a launch vehicle for its new operating system, BlackBerry 10. That new operating system, known internally as QNX, doesn't just allow for basic gestures and multitouch controls, the new OS will, according to RIM's interview with The Verge, allow for "natural communications that occur between you and the device without the need to look at the screen or type on the keyboard." For now, the new device will be RIM's first touchscreen device with a physical keyboard. There's no word on whether the device will have a physical keyboard in addition to a touchscreen, or if this will be a new attempt to position RIM as a competitor in the tablet market, instead of the phone market. RIM is also putting a lot of weight on the December release date. The company says the new device will be first available in Asia and Europe, and has also committed to bringing the new OS to market at least twice a year for the next two years.Q: How to load a plist or other strings file (or any type of raw data) into a dictionary to be used with Foundation classes
