Actually, Lightroom and Photoshop are very similar as desktop editing tools. The lay out looks the same and most of the options are the same. Photoshop is a powerful editing tool with features typically found in other popular photo editing software like Photoshop Elements, Lightroom and RAW Developer. My one complaint about Lightroom is its inability to edit RAW files. Even the most basic editing tools are absent. I wish it had more RAW editing features. Overall, though, Lightroom is a powerful asset to those serious about editing their images. Hopefully, that enthusiasm will translate into more RAW editing features in the future. And hopefully, Adobe will continue to improve Lightroom. However, you can create some great images using just Lightroom. Lightroom editing tools exclude RAW editing, but it doesn't fill these gaps. Plus, you can use Lightroom like a digital darkroom to dye, fix and sharpen images. Compare that to Photoshop - the ability to process RAW files is vital for true professional work. Adobe should prioritise RAW editing if they intend to stay competitive. In the end, Lightroom is a streamlined, powerful photo editing application that is perfect for anyone who wants to create professional-quality images. It does just enough to make it the best choice, but it lacks some basic photo editing features, such as RAW editing. Those features are valuable for producing some of the best images possible. It's no wonder that Photoshop is so popular, what with so many features. But it doesn't mean people aren't still using Lightroom.
